Intentionally artistic

Everybody has moments of inspiration, grand or simple. It happens all the time. Whether through you, around you, or because of you, events happen that change your thinking. It is those moments where your thoughts are entertained with new ideas and excitement and you have a bit more jump in your step. For that instant you can feel it all, like it was a message sent straight to your soul. You soak it all in, rehearse the enlightened statement that you are going to shout from your grand stage, sing along with the great musical masters, the whole nine yards. And then . . . you notice that you are just sitting in the middle of your living room and casually brush off the experience while moving on to get something more productive done.

These quick inspired moments, small or grand, have now become my life's work. It always seemed like such a waste to me, the casual brush off of inspiration. I wanted to be able to capture that enlightened feeling, bottle it up in a jar and rush out the door yelling "take a look at this!"

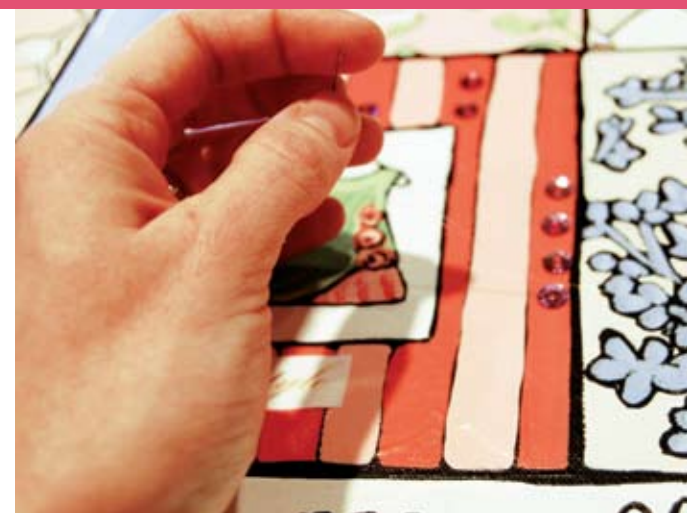

I knew from an early age that I wanted to be an artist. It was an easy decision to make as a child. I like this and I want to do this for the rest of my life. Done. Formal art training mastered the technique, and age has mastered the understanding of what true inspiration can affect.

Every artist is looking for their core subject, a central theme that is the main blood line through all their work. I wanted something challenging, complex, and difficult to capture. Something exciting, something that . . . I couldn't decide on. I brushed the thoughts off and left the couch to go watch an impromptu sock puppet show that my two children were performing on the floor. Then, it was answered . . . my children.

I based MaryJack Studios on the inspiring and complex imaginations of my two children, Jackson and MaryAnn. I can think of nothing with more relevance or purpose than adding to the environment in which a child dreams. It seems as though everyone gives credit to children for having such wonderful vivid imaginations and excitable thoughts, but far too often it stops there. I wanted to challenge the idea that the only option in decorating a child's environment is simple, basic illustrations. Why not art? Why not something intentionally inspirational?

It became exciting to me to think about using the wall space in a child's room instead as a gallery setting, something that set the backdrop for a child's own creative juices to flow. I am constantly challenged by the task of both creating pieces to illustrate the simple innocence of a child while still catering to their complex growing understanding. I have loved every moment of it.

My pieces are simply a jar in which to display the brilliant inspiration of children.

Features of the MaryJack Studios giclee print collection

Canvases are gallery wrapped on 2" deep solid wood frames.

Each piece is treated with a UV protectant varnish and then lightly dusted with an iridescent powder.

Sequin and bead embellishments are hand-sewn.
